A facile fabrication of a porphyrin-containing polymer nanostructure using an emulsion polymerization technique was achieved. The polymer nanostructure was formed by a solvent-evaporation-induced polymerization process. The solvent was evaporated out at a slow rate, which led to a slow-drying and formation of microparticles in the polymer matrix. Then the resulting microparticles were either heated to form nanosized porphyrin particles or sonicated to precipitate the porphyrin-containing nanostructure. The characterizations of the polymer nanostructure by ultraviolet-visible spectra, fluorescence spectra, and X-ray diffraction revealed that the polymer nanostructure consisted of porphyrin particles of approximately 10 nm in size. The microparticles were no longer present in the polymer nanostructure. In the presence of copper, the porphyrin-containing polymer nanostructure displayed an enhancement in the fluorescence intensity. This study presents a facile method for the formation of the porphyrin-containing polymer nanostructure. Article content OTTAWA — The Liberal government's move to scrap two popular conservation programs has sparked a wider debate about the role of the federal government in environmental protection. Environment Minister Catherine McKenna says the budget is balanced but government needs to listen to the public and will put the programs on the chopping block, along with one in Atlantic Canada. McKenna told The Canadian Press on Friday that the Liberals are seeking less money for conservation. "This is a budget that is balanced on the backs of Canadians — we're not seeking to spend any more," she said. "We're not looking to save in this budget. We're looking to invest in programs that create jobs." Morneau was quick to point out Friday that all of the Liberal cabinet ministers and their ministers have signed the 2d92ce491b
