The common causes of failure in treating benign prostatic hypertrophy. Benign prostatic hypertrophy (BPH) occurs in all age groups of men and is a frequently diagnosed disease. It is important for the clinician to be able to recognize the underlying etiology of the problem, so that effective treatment can be instituted, and the patient can be prevented from being frustrated with the treatment. In patients who suffer from retention of urine, the physician is faced with the decision of whether to treat the patient with drugs or surgery, and many studies have attempted to define which method of treatment is more effective. Although many studies have been conducted, the controversy still exists. This article attempts to define the underlying causes of urinary retention in patients with BPH and examine which treatment method can be the most effective.

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. House of Representatives voted on Wednesday to bar federal funding for the "Promoting Enduring Professionalism in the Sciences and Engineering Careers" (PEPSEC) program, which the National Science Foundation says is aimed at curbing sexual harassment in the workplace. The House Science, Space and Technology Committee voted 23-18 to permanently suspend the $17 million program and send the legislation to the full House of Representatives, which has to vote again on final passage. Sexual harassment is a widespread problem in scientific, engineering and medical research, according to the U.S. Office of Civil Rights. "The PEPSEC program is flawed and has failed," Representative Lamar Smith, the committee's Republican chairman, said in a statement. "This program was supposed to be about educating teachers, science and math teachers, but instead it has turned into a slush fund to bribe scientists and engineers to not cooperate with lawful oversight by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission." The National Science Foundation and the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy are expected to appeal to the U.S.
