Saturated tachycardia with oscillations in the atrium and ventricles leads to a v wave on the descending limb of the atrial electrogram and a monophasic R-wave in lead aVL . Over time and with continuous use, the tissue eventually loses its ability to repair itself. . The Spectacles are finally here, but it looks like they're being shipped with a bad lens The first generation of Google Glass-style contact lenses that can record and stream video from the eyes are finally being delivered to Google's early testers. The company started shipping the first pair to developers this past week, but that hasn't stopped some early testers from going ahead and trying the gadget on their own faces. These new Glasses-style lenses, sold as the Crystal X Frames, work in a similar fashion as Google's current $1,500 developer version. The difference between the Crystal X Frames and the Crystal Frames that Google is selling today is that the Crystal X Frames are for consumer use, and they can be used out in the real world. Google is selling the first pair for $1,500, and additional pairs will be available for $1,000 each, making the Crystal X Frames much more affordable than Google Glass. The Crystal X Frames are being sold via Google's online store. At the last CES, Google revealed that it had sold 25,000 pairs of its Google Glass devices, and it was unclear at the time how the company planned to market them. With the Crystal X Frames, Google seems to be gearing them toward the general public. For people who already have prescription eyeglasses, Google's contacts are probably not going to work. The Crystal X Frames are designed to be worn
