cells. Langerhans cells (LC) from adult human epidermis were studied for their growth, phenotypic and functional characteristics in long-term cultures in the presence of recombinant interleukin (rIL)-2 or rIL-1 alpha. Compared with LC from fetal and newborn skin, adult LC grew significantly better and were able to proliferate for several weeks in medium supplemented with rIL-2. The phenotype of adult LC did not change significantly during these cultures. rIL-1 alpha was not able to sustain LC growth, nor did it affect the phenotype of adult LC. The addition of rIL-1 alpha or rIL-2 to the cultures resulted in the synthesis of interferon-gamma (IFN-gamma) and IL-1 alpha by the LC. This was demonstrated by the detection of mRNA for IFN-gamma in RNA isolated from LC cultures grown with rIL-1 alpha. In contrast, IL-6 and IL-8 were not detectable in these cultures. The LC did not proliferate in the presence of IFN-gamma alone, indicating that the IFN-gamma induced by rIL-1 alpha did not directly induce LC growth. The present invention relates
