At the RAC, major airfields that are crucial to RAF operations have been experiencing problems with equipment. The unavailability of legacy ground controlled interception (GCI) radars is hampering the ability of the RAF to protect airfields and use them for training. The message traffic at these airfields is also being disrupted which is likely to have an impact on the ability of the RAF to deliver its core capability of air-to-air, air-to-surface and air-to-ground close air support. The RAF is in a process of tackling this issue as well as that of the lack of up-to-date satellite navigation equipment across the force. Government sources suggest that the equipment capability gap is being tackled with a variety of solutions, including upgraded helicopter MRUs and upgraded high-performance radar-estimation systems, some of which are already in service. The issue of equipment capability was raised at the recent high-level weekly defence committee meeting chaired by Defence Secretary Philip Hammond. In discussions with counterparts, it was decided that the RAF would secure RAF airfields this year and meet its timelines and commitments, even if this means rationing the availability of some of the additional equipment, such as GCI radar systems. This means that the RAF is delaying the delivery of some equipment. These capabilities are clearly important to the defence of Britain and are a key part
