below.The development of insulin resistance, beta-cell dysfunction, and hypertension is an important feature of several important metabolic diseases including obesity, type II diabetes, and essential hypertension. Accordingly, the overall goal of this project is to define the mechanisms by which insulin resistance and hypertension are induced in these conditions. The first aim will focus on how the ATP-dependent

phosphoprotein phosphatase, PP2A, is upregulated in metabolic syndrome, thereby
contributing to the
reduced insulin sensitivity. To this end, a comprehensive investigation of all
aspects of insulin
signaling will be conducted, including the insulin-induced tyrosine phosphorylation of insulin receptor substrate (IRS) proteins, activation of PI 3-kinase, and association with downstream signaling molecules. We will examine the in vivo and in vitro consequences of insulin resistance on vascular and renal function. The second aim will explore a recently described, novel insulin-like, feedback inhibition of insulin signaling by elevated blood pressure. This study will focus on the potential direct and indirect effects of hypertensive stress on insulin signaling by using a novel murine model of chronic volume expansion and salt-induced hypertension. The third aim will investigate a novel signaling mechanism by which angiotensin II and other hypertensive stimuli alter insulin signaling. We will identify the intracellular pathway involved in the angiotensin II effect and will explore the relationship between angiotensin II and insulin resistance. The fourth aim is a direct comparison of hypertensive and obesity models to determine the relative contributions of increased activity of the renin-angiotensin system and increased adiposity on insulin signaling and vascular and renal function. The in vivo studies will employ established mouse models of type II diabetes,
