fi:Nokia:TurboCADHi Thanks. Yes, I do quite a bit of that with USB sticks. I've also ordered a flash drive with a write-protect cap on it. That's true, and it's one of the reasons that a lot of USB drives are so easy to steal. I'll try to make sure my sticks don't have a cap on them, but to be honest, with all my family members working with macs I don't think they'd notice it anyway. The only other thing I've noticed is that with a USB drive that I am in the habit of writing to, I've noticed that the writing sometimes becomes a little bit slow (especially when writing very small amounts of data). I don't think that's a big deal, though. It's really not noticeable to a human, I think. I usually put a TPM/FRNG into the USB stick, so if it gets stolen, I can prove that it wasn't my computer. If the computer is lost, and it is found to have malware (such as PUP, Trojan), I can prove that I did not install it. I agree with this. I have a hackintosh, and I really want to make sure that I don't install any malware, and to make sure that it isn't stolen, and my hacker wanted to make sure that it wasn't stolen, he bought a caddy to put in the front of his hackintosh so it was harder to steal. I took the drive out and put it into a friend's computer, he doesn't have any malware or anything like that. I've been thinking about adding a write-protect cap, too, but I'm not sure how hard it'd be to do. I know that with hard drives, it's really easy to open them up and just pull the platter out. I'm guessing it'd be similar with USB drives. There's a write-protect cap on my flash drives. They're a lot easier to steal than hard drives, though, so I keep them in my car and hand them to my wife if I need them. Yeah, the benefit of a write-protect cap is that you can steal the drive and it's still readable, so you can still use it. I usually leave a short note saying "Please return with this to Fiancé. If you lose it, we'll be mad." If you
