Drowning lessons: can kids learn from this catastrophic event in Nigeria? Friday, September 25, 2015 - 11:55 4.8/5 09 / 25 / 2015 - 11:55 "In Nigeria, around 70 people are reported to have been killed by floodwaters following torrential rain and stormy weather. The "drowning lesson" was used by N.H. Muriithi, a local radio broadcaster, who said he had seen many people die at his home. Mr. Muriithi, who has worked in the media for many years, and has covered the floods in the area, said he knew something was wrong when his family and the neighbors he had gone to help did not respond to his calls and knocks. "I knew that something was wrong. The people were not responding. They were simply staring at me in horror," Mr. Muriithi told "Good Morning South Africa," on eNCA. "So, I called my parents who live in the town and they told me to call the police because their house was also under water. But by then it was already too late, they had already died," he said. Mr. Muriithi called his station to tell people to get out of the flooded area. He took shelter with his colleagues on his office roof as the area continued to flood and he urged residents of the area to stay off the roads because of the fast-rising waters. "I did not know what to do. I had no way of contacting anyone. My staff were calling their relatives who live in the area, but there was no reply," Mr. Muriithi said. He said he could not keep watch over his family and his office staff as the waters rose, so he took his gun and headed to the scene of the flood." Almost three days later, on Monday morning, he returned to the flooded area to discover that the body of his friend, father and brother were still there. Mr. Muriithi said he could not be more devastated. "I am at a loss. I have lost my family and I don't even know where my parents are," he said. He said he would try to find out where his father was, but if he is dead, he would do whatever it takes to move his body. The accident occurred as the 9
