Control flow has to happen, no matter what you do with the flow but no errors should propagate to other parts of the code that doesn't have to be told that it is a problem. The compiler should make sure it is not letting errors propagate. If you implement a function that is only called with X and Y and the X is not what you expected then it should be handled/notified internally and be a trap/error, but not error propagate to other parts. I know that is a bit
