
given the nod to a controversial Virginia law that requires people to use only native plants in their state parks. In a 5-4 decision, the justices ruled the general ban on non-native plants violated the First Amendment. The law is the latest in a string of laws adopted by various states to protect the habitat of native plants.

The move is likely to increase tension between the states and the federal government. The SCOTUS case involved the prohibition in National Park Service regulations against the use of non-native plants within the National Park System. The regulation was adopted pursuant to congressional authority. However, the regulation was not made consistent with the earlier Supreme Court case of Sierra Club v. Morton. As a result, the Virginia ban was struck down. However, the Virginia law has a lot in common with the kinds of laws passed by other states. Even though the court struck the Virginia law, it could not decide whether state laws prohibiting the use of non-native plants were valid. It said it did not need to reach this issue. As a result, the court left it to the various states to decide for themselves whether non-native plants were a good or bad thing. The court did decide whether federal agencies could restrict states, as Congress did in the National Park Service regulations. The court said federal regulations that conflict with state legislation are invalid. The court sent the case back to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to revisit the question of whether the National
