Proceeding from a pronounced vein of conservatism, religious and otherwise, there have been as many new groups as there have been problems to which they have been summoned to solve. Indeed, the first all-American reform movement, the temperance movement, made its first impact, in part, by including within its ranks both clergy and laymen, men and women. The many sects of Christianity that have issued forth from the religious ferment of America (such as the Moralists and the Unitarians) are but the offspring of liberalism, and new liberal religions continue to grow, such as the Unitarianism and Universalism of the nineteenth century, and many other forms of modern humanism. Quakerism, which has taken the name of Progressive Faith, has evolved a type of social regeneration which is identical with, but more aggressive than, the Communism of Marx. In the same way that churches have spawned their own denominations, sects and Asphaltene contains metals and organic compounds as heavy metals. The toxicity mechanism of heavy metals has already been reported but the effect of organic compounds is still unclear. Therefore, the present study investigated the influence of aged asphaltene on the cytotoxicity and genotoxicity in cultured human hepatocytes. Aged asphaltene was prepared from a crude oil and the toxicity was determined by the MTT assay. The genotoxicity of aged asphaltene was measured with the comet and micronucleus assays. Furthermore, the cellular toxicity and genotoxicity of metals were investigated by using Cu, Zn, Hg, Cd and Pb as metal ions. The toxicity was found to be decreased with the longer exposure time (72 h). The results obtained by the comet assay showed that the genotoxic response was more evident after exposure to aged asphaltene than to aged naphthalene. However, no significant difference was observed in the micronucleus assay after exposure to aged asphaltene. Asphaltene has been considered to be a complex mixture composed of complex molecules such as sterols and quinones. This indicates the possibility that the activity of each compound in the mixture is related to the toxicity. We should consider the toxicity of the mixture, rather than individual compound, when the effects are observed.Q: Unit Testing ServiceStack Im looking to start unit testing for a ServiceStack service I have written, and cant find any good examples that might be useful.
