More than 50 percent of Syria's population has been displaced by the violence, and the UN human rights office has raised concerns that up to seven million people are living in dire conditions. Large crowds of people have made their way to camps and sites to escape fighting between rebels and government forces in rebel-held areas of Damascus and Homs. At least 15 people have been killed in Homs and Syria's central Homs city, and 19 have died in a mortar attack on Damascus. "It is a catastrophe in terms of numbers," UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay told The Associated Press news agency, adding that the situation is worsening by the day. "I'm very concerned about the two neighborhoods of Douma and al-Ghouta on the outskirts of Damascus. They have been attacked by the regime forces and by tanks, and about 50,000 people have been forced to flee. They have nowhere to go and some are even in hiding. If this doesn't stop, it will be very difficult for them to go back," she said. In another development, Iraq's defense ministry said it has dropped leaflets over Syria's Damascus airport warning that it would shoot down any aircraft that violate the country's airspace. Diplomatic efforts Diplomatic efforts have been overshadowed by the fighting, which has left at least 78 people dead since the weekend. At least 17 people were killed in Damascus, and also more in the rebel-controlled suburbs of Aleppo, Hama and Idlib. At least 25 people were also killed in a mortar attack on the town of Qusayr, in the Homs province. Homs and Damascus Car bombs, gunfire and mortar shelling have killed more than 20 people in the city of Homs, with at least another eight killed in a mortar attack on the town of Qusayr in Homs province. The Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said the violence in Homs and Damascus has been the worst this year. Amnesty International's Heba Morayef said the bloodshed was a "shocking and shameful development" and that the attack on Qusayr sent the government a "stark message - that if they continue to assault civilian areas, they will find out that they are doing so at their own peril." Militants from the Free Syrian Army have been in
